The port anchor of the Ning Chow was let go, but failed to bring her up, and she swept along the whole length of her sister ship, carrying away awnings, rails, davits, and staving in a lifebrat as she did so. Although the two steamers were only a hand's breadth of each other when the Ning Char was brought up at last, the hulls of the ships never came into actual contact, the damage inflicted being done by the starboard anchor of the Ning Chair, which projected slightly over the steamer's bow. The escape of the Ching Wo was a very narrow one, it seemed up to the last moment as if a disastrous collision was about to take place. The cargo boats of the Ching Wo had just left the ship's side a few minutes before, or else they would have been badly cut up, and the cargo boats alongside the Northern got off with remarkably little pace to spare between themselves and the bows of the Ning Chow. - Straits Times.
